DAILY SHORT STORY A Mysterious Messenger.

[Original.] People not in the army are apt to fancy that the families of soldiers are always prepared for those partings consequent upon the brenking out of war. This is not so. When an army woman is obliged to part with a husband, a son or both, knowing that there are many chances that they will not return to her, she suffers accordingly.

When the war with the Modoc Indians broke out in the early seventies Captain Winterton left his bride at a frontier post and marched with bis command to the lava beds. She did not see it and went outside to look for it, but without success.

She was frightened. She dreaded lest this strange message from her husband, coming in such uncanny fashion, was a prelude to bad news. She sent a request for the officer in command of the post to visit her, and when he came she told him the story. He decays the straight of the story is the story. The soldier could not have got into the post without having been seen by the sentry at the gate and the one pacing before the officers' quarters.

The "police" squad, whose duty it was to pick up every bit of paper that littered the inclosure, was instructed to look out for the letter, but they never produced it. Mrs. Winterton's nervousness increased to hysteria, and word was sent to her husband to return as soon as possible. He obtained leave to do so and at once set out for the fort. The commandant met him before he saw his wife and told him of the vision, or whatever it might be, that had visited Mrs. Winterton.

Winterton stood aghast. It was some time before he could reply to inquiries as to his astonishment, but at last he
